

The annual congressional art competition, which brings together the best student artwork from across the Fourth District, features a $1,500 per year scholarship to the Savannah College of Art and Design as the top prize. In addition to the scholarship, the winning entry will be hung, along with entries from other congressional districts, in a corridor of the U.S. Capitol Building.

There are three ways to qualify for the competition:

1. Art Center Contests

High school students who place (first, second, third, or honorable mention) in appropriate categories at art center contests are eligible to submit their winning entries.

2. High School Contests or School Selection

Public and private high schools in the Fourth Congressional District are invited to select up to three pieces of artwork to represent their school in this competition. The selection process for that artwork is completely at the discretion of school officials. Local schools will be mailed a packet with the complete rules, deadlines, and an entry form.

3. Home School Participation

Home school students are encouraged to enter their artwork at regional art center competitions. However, if a student is not able to submit their work for some reason (location, did not know about the contests, etc.), he/she may still be considered for the Artistic Discovery contest.

The winner will be invited to attend the opening exhibit in Washington, D.C., with other winners from across the country.

Please check back in January 2012 for updated deadlines.
